The generator blades were crushed by villagers

Overview

Are wind turbine blades buried in landfills?

But it's not exactly right. It is true that decommissioned wind turbine blades are often thrown away in landfills. The image in the meme shows blades being buried at the Casper Regional Landfill in Wyoming. It was taken by photographer Benjamin Rasmussen and featured in a February 2020 Bloomberg article about blade waste.

How many turbine blades are scrapped a year?

Last year, more than 12,000 blades were scrapped globally, according to data provider BloombergNEF, which expects the number to exceed 28,000 in 2030. This could result in hundreds of thousands of metric tons of waste each year. Turbine blades can last 20 to 30 years, but companies often replace them earlier with more efficient designs.

Are old wind turbine blades recyclable?

Old wind-turbine blades are getting a new lease on life—in cement. Turbines are mostly made of steel, a widely recyclable material. But their blades are constructed of complex composite materials such as fiberglass and balsa wood that are difficult to separate and process, presenting a recycling challenge.

How does a generator work?

Usually, water or air push the blades and turn the shaft. Turbines are used to turn the generator. – A machine that is used to make electricity. When the generator head is turned, this kinetic energy is converted to electrical energy.

How many wind turbine blades does Veolia make a year?

After launching its service less than two years ago, Veolia now charges wind-turbine operators and manufacturers to prepare more than 3,000 blades a year in the U.S. for use in cement production. Veolia says the blades it processes typically weigh 6 to 10 tons.

Are old wind turbine blades profitable?

The business covers the majority of retired blades in the U.S. and is already profitable for Veolia, Mr. Howell said. Among the cement makers Veolia works with is Italy's Buzzi Unicem SpA, which through its U.S. subsidiary started using old wind-turbine blades as a replacement for fossil fuels two years ago.
